

For the Unborn, the Living and the Dead

People don't like to talk about death. People switch topic or sit with unease when confronted with the truth that we are all in the process of dying and could die anytime. We have always sought immortality and the founders of the large tech companies are investing massive sums of money into their quest for the holy grail. Over the centuries we have been trained to lead our lives with an assumed sense of stability. That tomorrow will be tomorrow and that next year will be next year. Rather than an idea that there might not be a tomorrow. In fact, humankind exists in a state between life and death, hovering on a continual edge. From the moment our soft skulls crest out of the womb covered in amniotic fluid we are flying head first towards our impending death. Be that tomorrow or fifty years from now.
